1. Executive Summary

This report summarises the findings of a public consultation on divorce reform, the future of civil partnerships and the age of marriage, which ran from 18 November 2018 to 22 February 2019.

The report reflects a very clear set of emerging themes, with strong majority viewpoints for most questions posed as part of the consultation.

The results and subsequent commitments summarised below – explored in more detail in the body of the report – aim to reflect the responses received during the consultation period and explain why the changes are proposed.

A commitment has been made to bring forward a report and proposition, which will seek States approval for the process and timeframes associated with bringing forward the necessary legislative changes to reform the islands divorce laws including:

- Moving to a no fault divorce based system of divorce which will in turn abolish the requirement for a period of separation
- Enabling couples to jointly file for divorce
- Extending the minimum timeframe for divorce
- Removing the ability of either party to contest a divorce
- Abolishing the three year bar for filing for divorce

Further commitments will be made to bring forward a report and proposition, which will seek States approval for the process associated with bringing forward the necessary legislative changes to amend the islands marriage laws to address the following:

- Making Civil Partnerships available to all couples regardless of gender
- Raising the minimum age of marriage from 16 to 18

Note: Ministry of Justice consultation on reform of the legal requirements for divorce

It should be noted that since publishing the Divorce Reform, Future of Civil Partnerships and Age of Marriage Consultation Document the Ministry of Justice has consulted and published its response on the topic of divorce reform. The proposals put forward by the Ministry of Justice were similar to the topics examined by Jersey's consultation including: No fault divorce, joint filing for divorce, examining the minimum timeframe for divorce, removing the ability to contest a divorce and abolishing the one year bar. The results of the areas of questioning regarding divorce reform were very similar and both consultations set out from the similar position of attempting to reduce family conflict. The Ministry of Justice did not however consult on the future of civil partnerships or the age of marriage.

2. Background to consultation

The Divorce reform, future of civil partnerships & age of marriage consultation ran from 18 November 2018 to 22 February 2019.

Written Submissions

People could submit their response via an online consultation survey or in writing.

168 people responded to the consultation online with a further 18 people responding via email or letter.

Three public meetings were arranged at different times and on different days and were promoted via media; however, no members of the public attended.

Note: Limits on the consultation process

The feedback from the public consultation process provides valuable insight into respondents' views about divorce reform, the future of civil partnerships and the age of marriage.

In reviewing the feedback received, it is important to note that this reflects the views of people who responded to the consultation. The feedback is not statistically sound, and does not necessary represent the views of islanders as a whole.

The key issues and themes that arose from the consultation are set out below, in an order that corresponds to the initial consultation questionnaire. This includes a selection of the comments received¹, but these comments do not represent an exhaustive list of all points raised – it is not possible to include all them all within this report.

¹ The comments included within this report are letters and emails received or from online survey responses. Comments have not been amended unless to correct spelling and punctuation for ease of reading, as auto correct facilities were not available as part of the online survey software. Where a comment has been abbreviated, this is indicated.

3. Divorce reform

3.1 Fault based divorce

Background

Currently when a person files for divorce in Jersey they must cite the grounds for that divorce (i.e. state the reason why they want to get divorced). Grounds for divorce in Jersey are based on a period of separation (i.e. the spouses do not live together) or on 'fault' (i.e. one spouse declares the other spouse to be fault).

There are five fault based grounds; unreasonable behaviour, adultery, desertion, mental disorder & imprisonment.

Jersey is one of only a relatively few jurisdictions² that has fault-based divorce, as opposed to no-fault divorce or broader based grounds such as irretrievable breakdown.

Fault-based divorce can be a major contributor to conflict, as one partner is required to state that the other is at fault.

Response to consultation

The public were asked if fault-based divorce should be abolished.

71% of respondents said yes, 25% said no and 4% stated they did not know/had no preference. A further 7 did not respond to the question.

The majority clearly felt that citing fault in divorce proceedings only served to create further rifts between the divorcing parties:

"Fault based divorce does nothing to allow couples to move on with their lives, it causes unhappiness and distress and has consequential effects on the arrangements for children and financial settlements. It is time that people are allowed to leave unhappy marriages without having to blame anyone else."

"Fault basis is totally wrong. Being in a totally unhappy marriage should not be a life sentence as it may not be anyone's FAULT. Times and people change, unfortunately many people are unable to change together and change away from each other. Fault is irrelevant."

"The requirement for finding fault - and in a public forum - undermines attempts to have as amicable a process as possible, which is key for future interactions, particularly as to children. The bringing of such before the court and the swearing of affidavits setting out the circumstances hardens position and animosity and delays the healing process. I do not agree that it helps a wronged party. Even if it does in one way, the detrimental effect outweighs any benefit."

² England and Wales maintains a fault-based system, as do Scotland, various US States, Canada and France although the grounds for fault do vary between jurisdictions. In some, adultery is a "fact" used to demonstrate a fault such as "irretrievable breakdown", rather than a fault in its own right.

“As a family law professional my experience is that the current fault based divorce which requires parties to apportion blame creates unnecessary and additional conflict in family law cases. The fault based system inevitably causes animosity, and as a practitioner it makes it much harder to encourage couples to work together to reach a mutually acceptable resolution of their matrimonial matters.”

Some respondents were clear that if spouses believe that divorce is the right choice for them, they should not be required to cite fault or be subjected to a long period of separation:

“People choose to divorce for amicable reasons too, divorce is portrayed as a negative and painful termination of a relationship even when the couple concerned may have enjoyed a successful marriage but simply grown apart.”

Other respondents took a different position, believing that abolishing fault-based divorce could damage the institution of marriage:

“I consider that the current requirements for divorce remain appropriate and am not in favour of facilitating divorce without cause. Marriage is a commitment which once entered into should not be set aside on a mere whim. The innocent party should be able to block a speedy divorce.”

“I feel that there are circumstances where blame should be specified. It is up to the injured party to decide if they wish to do so.”

The key theme most commonly expressed in support of abolishing fault-based divorce was the potential to minimise conflict. The majority of respondents clearly believe that the current process of citing fault does nothing beyond escalating tension within an already strained situation. They believe this detracts from focussing on the best interests of any children involved and is at odds with a child-focussed approach to family law matters.

Allocation of fault does not have any bearing on the process of divorce or the associated financial settlement.

The 2015 Law Commission’s Report states:

“Divorce law in Jersey needs to be reformed. A move to a no fault system would be in keeping with the general trend towards a more conciliatory approach to divorce law across the world and the encouragement of non-court forms of resolution of financial matters and arrangements for children.”

3.2 Divorce Based on a Period of Separation

Background

In Jersey there are two periods of separation in relation to divorce³:

³ These periods of separation are lower than England & Wales which currently stand at 2 years and 5 years.

- a. the spouses have lived apart continuously for at least 1 year and both spouses agree to get a divorce, or
- b. the spouses have lived apart continuously for at least 2 years and only one spouse want to divorce.

Both must be continuous periods. This means that if the couple spend a single night together, the clock must be reset. This does not support couples to see if they can reconcile their differences. Indeed the requirement for a continuous period of separation actually deters attempts at reconciliation.

Response to consultation

The public were asked if divorce based on a period of separation should be abolished.

53% respondents said yes, 41% said no, 6% stated they did not know/had no preference. 8 did not respond to the question.

A significant number of respondents stated that if one party no longer wishes to remain married they should not be forced to wait until the prescribed period of separation is over:

“The current period of 2 years separation should be abolished as this could lead to personal anguish and potentially mental health issues if one individual is legally bound to another and they no longer wish to be part of the personal association.”

“It is unreasonable to expect couples to stay married when the relationship has broken down. They should not need a reason to be able to move on with their lives.”

“Forcing one person to wait longer for a divorce, simply because the other person doesn't want the marriage to end, is ridiculous.”

“It should not be necessary for parties to have been separated for any period of time before divorce proceedings are started. A period of reflection as part of the process is a good thing, but perhaps not necessary if there is a joint application for the divorce. The importance of being able to start a divorce before a lengthy period of separation is so that financial matters can be sorted at an earlier stage.”

“The time period allows the "controlling" spouse to delay and keep control. In my case his capacity for denial is endless and continues after divorce. Separation is problematic if you separate within one building in good faith.”

“I know there is argument the required period of separation should be long, to give the parties a chance to reconcile. But if the parties are already living apart, reconciliation is unlikely and even if mediation is mandated, it can become a kind of ongoing farce where there is no real hope of mending the marriage. So I suggest divorce is allowable by mutual consent following a separation of 6 months.”

“The need to have been separated for X period of time can make it harder for parties to resolve their financial and children issues swiftly and harmoniously. Why put off the inevitable? We also see many couples who simply cannot to live separately for the requisite period of time, effectively forcing them to remain living together for a period of time, which does nothing to help them move on and heal.”

Currently if divorcing parties are not willing to cite fault based grounds for divorce, they must live separately for the prescribed period of time. This is problematic for many Jersey residents due to the cost of maintaining two independent households and associated controls on access to housing. This was reflected in comments received:

“Not everyone can afford to live separately as the Island and divorce is already very expensive, financially and emotionally. Separation is ok if you are trying to establish desertion for grounds to divorce. With no fault divorces, there seems no point in requiring separation.”

“Achieving separation in order to commence divorce proceedings can also be practically difficult, particularly in cases where there are limited resources and the parties have no option but to remain living together in the former matrimonial home pending resolution of their finances. Advising clients to maintain "separate households" within the former matrimonial home is highly artificial and frequently detrimental where the parties' children are also living in the home. Where parties are joint owners of property, they both have a right to remain living in the former matrimonial home, and there are no grounds to ask them to leave other than in cases where there is domestic violence.”

“It is expensive in Jersey, so some can't afford to move out.”

Moreover, some consultation respondents correctly identified that if no fault divorce is introduced then the current period of separation grounds for divorce would effectively become redundant:

“This would also be redundant if a new divorce law removes the requirement to find fault and replaces it with one reason - irretrievable breakdown of the marriage, or similar.”

“Only abolish it if also abolishing fault based divorce. If fault based divorce is retained it is important to have the separation ground - which should be one year.”

“Separation should not be a reason for divorce - couples should be allowed to live together whilst filing for divorce, especially if it is a no-fault divorce.”

3.3 Joint filing for divorce

Background

It is important to minimise conflict in divorce because of the effect it has on couples and also on their children. There is a body of research evidence that clearly shows that conflict between parents has a detrimental effect on children's outcomes. It increases the risk of anxiety, depression, aggression and anti-social behaviour⁴. It is therefore essential that we look to reduce harm and conflict. The current reality for many couples is that the decision to divorce is one that is made jointly, and joint initiation is conducive to a more conciliatory approach.

⁴ See Equal Marriage Report (R 170/2014)

Response to consultation

The consultation asked the public if they agreed that couples should be able to file jointly for divorce, in addition to being able to file independently.

94% of respondents agreed, 3% did not agree, 3% did not have a preference. 8 respondents did not answer the question.

“I agree very strongly about this. I have been divorced and although we had agreement, the process of accusing one another rather than jointly filing was not ideal.”

“So many of my clients are in agreement with their spouse that the marriage is over and they want to divorce in a simple and amicable way. Unfortunately the current system forces couples to be adversarial and this can undo much of the positive work they have done themselves before seeking help.”

“Demonstrating that the divorce is a joint decision by the couple, rather than only taken by one party, makes it more likely that good working relations can be maintained between the couple for the sake of those affected by its breakdown.”

“Parties who have reached mutual consent should be able to progress the action of divorce jointly.”

“I see no reason why a couple who have jointly decided to end their marriage cannot apply for it to be dissolved together. This would support a no-fault system.”

“Blame where there is none can contribute to unnecessary negative emotions.”

A group of respondents identified the positive effect joint filing for divorce may have on children caught up in divorce proceedings.

“This encourages collective responsibility, which is important if children are involved.”

“Joint filing makes complete sense if fault based grounds are removed, less stress for all especially children.”

3.4 Minimum Timeframe for Divorce

Background

In Jersey currently, the court grants a decree nisi initially and then, after a minimum period of six weeks, issues a decree absolute. It is only at the stage of decree absolute that the marriage is brought to a legal end. This two-stage process provides a relatively small time timeframe for couples to consider the implications of the divorce and make associated practical arrangements.

Response to consultation

The public were asked if agreed that the minimum timeframe for the divorce process should be extended 11% of respondents agreed, 64% of respondents did not agree, 25% had no preference with 10 respondents did not provide an answer.

A number of respondents commented that the six-week period between the granting of the two decrees does not allow sufficient time for reflection, nor does it allow sufficient time for financial arrangements to be made. Moreover, it is not long enough to consider and agree arrangements relating to the couple's children, for example, where they live.

"After an application for divorce has been made, if the parties are agreed that the marriage should end immediately that should be possible. For other people a period of reflection after the application has been made and while matters relating to children and finances are considered would be a good idea. Perhaps a minimum period of 3 months."

"As per the 'consultation document', 6 months seems reasonable. But, this should be based on evidence from pro-family research, organisations, charities, et al."

"As always, the welfare of children should be paramount."

"It would be sensible, if the requirement for a period of separation is to be abolished, to increase the timeframe to perhaps three months. This will not prevent a party from obtaining a fairly speedy divorce, but will ensure that the parties have a period of reflection."

"Resolution (an organisation of family lawyers of which I am a member) has proposed a new divorce procedure where one or both parties can give notice that their marriage has broken down irretrievably. The parties divorce can then proceed and if after a period of six months either or both partners still feel they are making the right decision the divorce is finalised."

"Divorce should simply be the choice of one or both parties deciding they no longer wish to be married. Once this decision is made they should be free to divorce, as with buying ill-advised shoes online however there should be a processing period to allow 'cooling-off' should the parties agree."

"I think a 'cooling off' period for such a major life decision is a sensible stage."

"A period of separation can be helpful for both parties to reflect without definitive actions being progressed in haste."

"I know there is argument the required period of separation should be long, to give the parties a chance to reconcile. But if the parties are already living apart, reconciliation is unlikely and even if mediation is mandated, it can become a kind of ongoing farce where there is no real hope of mending the marriage. So I suggest divorce is allowable by mutual consent following a separation of 6 months."

Other respondents took a contrary viewing, stating that the existing 6 week timeframe was either too long or long enough:

"The length of time between the decree nisi and absolute is currently sufficient. As soon as my decree nisi was granted I could not wait for the absolute to be granted. That period of time was as painful as I could not quite move on with my life or cut the ties with my ex until the absolute had been granted."

"Don't make the process even longer and harder for those involved - it is an awful thing for anyone to go through, amicable or not - especially if fault based."

“The delay between decree nisi and an application for decree absolute is generally extended beyond the minimum timetable to enable the parties to resolve their matrimonial finances either by agreement or by order of the court. Parties are inevitably advised not to seek decree absolute until a final order has been made in relation to their finances as upon divorce a number of claims and rights are automatically dismissed. The Court is unable to make final matrimonial finance orders until decree nisi has been pronounced and this can cause unnecessary delay in circumstances in more straightforward cases where there are no children or where their financial affairs are not complex.”

“Six weeks is plenty for a ‘cooling off’ period.”

A number of respondents raised concerns that, where divorce proceedings involved domestic violence an extended minimum timeframe would not be in the victim’s best interest:

“It depends on the circumstances of the divorce and whether extending this period would contribute further difficulty to both parties. In the event of a case where there had been documented domestic abuse, extending this period of time could cause additional and unnecessary distress”.

The 2015 Law Commission’s report proposes that:

“There should be a period of 6 months from the date of the Statement of Marital Breakdown at which time either or both parties would be able to file a declaration that the marriage has broken down and then the divorce can be finalised.”

3.5 Contested Divorce

Background

Currently a spouse can contest a divorce to defend themselves from unfair accusations of fault. It is, however, extremely rare with no divorces being contested in Jersey for the last 20 years.

Contesting a divorce is expensive and rarely results in the Courts refusing to issue a decree absolute. Furthermore, if fault-based divorce is abolished, contested divorce will become virtually obsolete.

Consultation response

The public were asked if they agreed that the ability to contest a divorce should be abolished.

59% of respondents agreed, 32% disagreed, 9% had no preference and 8 respondents did not answer the question.

A majority of comments reflected the view that a marriage is over when one of the spouses believes it to be over:

“No. Providing a mechanism to allow a spouse to contest a divorce, when a period to encourage reconciliation is already built in, needlessly draws the process out. It also provides a way for a spouse to contest a divorce purely to inconvenience the other party.”

“If one person wants it then it should happen. You should not be able to force someone to stay married.”

“There should be no reason why one person should retain any control over the other person.”

“No, because if the divorce is prevented it seems exceedingly unlikely that a viable marriage will subsist thereafter.”

“In a civilised society it must be right that if one party feels their marriage has come to an end that should be sufficient of itself to entitle them to seek a divorce. In practise there is no benefit to either party of a contested divorce as the long term outcome is inevitably going to be the same. Contested proceedings are very rare. They are costly and extremely detrimental to parties who really need to focus and take advice on the important issues of a marriage breakdown namely resolving children arrangements and finance issues arising out of their marriage.”

“I think it's no longer necessary. In my case my ex wife threatened to contest the divorce purely as a tactical move, which ended up costing me a lot more in legal fees.”

A few points of opposition/concern were raised.

“Where the spouse filing for divorce is demonstrably of unsound mind, the other spouse should be able to contest it. However, if the couple are given access to counselling, mediation and reconciliation services before divorce proceedings can begin, especially when the divorce is filed by only one party, this type of situation should be easily identified.”

3.6 Three Year Bar

Background

In Jersey couples must be married for a least three years before they can file for divorce (this is known as the three-year bar). It is currently only one year in England & Wales, and there is no time limit in Scotland or in Guernsey.

It has been argued that the three-year bar is a safeguard against irresponsible or hasty marriages but there is no evidence to support this. 69% of respondents to the 2018 digital survey did not know that the three-year bar existed – it cannot be a deterrent if people do not know about it.

Consultation response

The public were asked if they agreed that the three year bar should be removed 75% of respondents agreed, 17% did not agree, 8% had no preference and 8 respondents did not answer the question.

Of those who did comment, a large number expressed the view that any rule forcing a couple to stay in a marriage was outdated and should be removed.

“This is outdated. If a marriage has failed after a year, a divorce should be able to go ahead. We spent two years waiting to be able to file, rather than getting on with our lives. Please remove the three year bar.”

“Forcing people to remain married against their will is unacceptable. The social mores have changed considerably since the Matrimonial Causes (Jersey) Law 1949 was passed. So many people live together before they marry, a paternalistic approach suggesting that people need to remain married so they can “work at” their relationship is completely outdated and an unwarranted intrusion into people's private lives.”

“Once a party wants to divorce there seems little reason to force them to stay in a marriage; obviously any benefit from having been married for a very short period of time would need to be withdrawn, or at least be able to be withdrawn (housing rights/citizenship etc) to avoid marriages of convenience.”

Those opposed to removing the three-year bar predominantly queried whether the removal of the three-bar would detract from the importance of the institution of marriage.

“A bar should still be in place, or it takes away from the sanctity of marriage. Whether people are religious or not, entering into a marriage should not be taken lightly, particularly given the heavy consequences which can flow from divorce, i.e. periodical payments for spousal maintenance.”

“Having a 3 year bar helps to reinforce the importance of marriage by encouraging people to properly consider whether they are ready to marry. The first years of marriage are also often the hardest, so a 3 year bar would potentially save marriages that would otherwise have worked in the longer term.”

“Until three years have elapsed it cannot be said that the marriage has been given a fair chance. Knowledge of such a bar should mean that marriage is not entered into lightly.”

“If, however, it's simply a case of inexperienced youngsters being unwilling to make an effort or otherwise accept the consequences of their (shortsighted) decisions, then they're best served by not having an easy-out, consequence-free, which merely enables them to repeat the same mistake again with another beau; relationship hopping, if you will.”

The 2015 Law Commission's report proposes that:

“ the law in Jersey should be changed there should be no restriction on issuing a divorce petition at any time after marriage. There is no public interest in preventing people from divorcing if their marriage has broken down within the first 3 years.”

4. Future of Civil Partnerships

Background

Civil partnerships were introduced in Jersey in 2012. The aim was to provide same-sex couples the same rights and responsibilities that opposite-sex couples could acquire through marriage, at a point in time when same-sex marriage was not considered a viable option.

In August 2014, the Chief Minister's Department undertook an *Equal Marriage*⁵ consultation. Whilst the consultation primarily focused on the proposed introduction of same-sex marriage, it also asked Islanders whether they thought that civil partnerships should be available to opposite-sex couples.

72% of the people who responded to that particular question agreed that civil partnerships should be available to opposite-sex couples.

Other respondents expressed concern that extending civil partnerships would simply create a "2nd tier" of marriage, which was not materially different and therefore viewed as unnecessary (or, in some cases, as a direct threat to the institution of marriage).

The 2014 consultation was limited, however, so in 2015, when the States Assembly debated marriage reform, it was accepted that the civil partnership law should remain unaltered until either more was understood about the uptake of civil partnerships post the introduction of same-sex marriage, or there was a related court ruling, which has now happened.

In July 2018 the UK Supreme Court ruled that it is discriminatory to only allow same-sex couples to enter into a civil partnership. Jersey should therefore amend its law.

Response to consultation

The public were asked if civil partnerships should be made available for all couples.

78% of respondents agreed, 14% disagreed, 8% did not know or had no preference and 10 people did not respond to the question.

When asked if Jersey should stop new civil partnerships but retain existing civil partnerships, 14% of respondents agreed, but 68% disagreed. This accords with the majority view that civil partnerships should be available to all couples.

Those who support the introduction of opposite-sex civil partnerships did so largely based on perceived equality:

"Anyone, regardless of sex, should be able to enter into a civil partnership."

⁵<https://www.gov.je/SiteCollectionDocuments/Government%20and%20administration/R%20equal%20marriage%20consultation%20report%20summary%2020141126%20LB.pdf>

“In this age of equality, all options should be available to all people no matter what gender etc.”

“Civil partnerships and marriage should be available to all, regardless of sexual orientation.”

“All couples should be able to marry/enter a civil partnership. I personally do not want to get married but would consider a civil partnership to protect my partner in the future and make sure he is covered should anything happen to me.”

Some respondents expressed the view that opposite-sex civil partnership is a viable alternative to marriage:

“Marriage is a patriarchal and religious institution (historically and in its origins). We should not be forced to “marry” just to obtain the legal rights and benefits involved in marriage. Civil partnerships should be made available to all. I am a married straight woman and I would have chosen a civil partnership instead of marriage, if it were available to me.”

“Civil partnerships are a great way of providing stability for couples who don’t wish to marry for personal reasons.”

“Civil partnerships seem to me to have the benefit of formalising the legal relations between a couple without bringing in the potentially religious elements or historical baggage of marriage. They should definitely be available to all sections of the community.”

Balance the inequality by offerings CPs to opposite sex couples. Many would wish to see a legal recognition of the joining of two people outside of the religious framework of marriage.

Not everyone wants to get married. It’s all about personal choice. Those who have experienced divorce may feel marriage is tarnished for them, and women, particularly, may feel that marriage carries patriarchal overtones. For some, a civil partnership is a modern, equal way of expressing their partnership. In the UK, 17% of same-sex couples have chosen civil partnership over marriage since its introduction in March 2014.

Many of the respondents who disagreed with extending civil partnerships stated that there is no requirement for civil partnerships as same-sex couples can now marry in Jersey:

“Now marriage is available to all, civil partnerships should be scrapped, they were only brought in to cater for same sex couples.”

“I believe that there is no need for civil partnerships as adults can (as is right) enter into marriage with any other adult who wishes to marry them.”

“Civil partnerships were brought in to mollify the gay lobby. Now there is gay marriage civil partnerships should be discontinued.”

Other respondents noted that given that marriage and civil partnership provide the exactly the same legal rights and responsibilities, civil partnerships are simply not needed:

“Civil partnerships were brought in to give same sex couples the same rights as opposite sex couples. Now same sex marriage is possible the need for civil partnerships is over. Existing civil partnerships should of course remain. Going forward, any couple who wish to show a long term commitment to each other can get married. People who think that civil partnerships are in some way intrinsically different from civil marriages are wrong. The rights and responsibilities are the same.”

Some of the comments received suggest confusion about the legal status of civil partnerships. It was clear that some respondents:

- believe that marriage is a religious institution and civil partnership are a non-religious alternative to marriage. This is not correct. Whilst civil partnerships are non-religious, civil marriage is an existing non-religious alternative to religious marriage
- believe that civil partnerships are different to marriage; a ‘lighter’ version with less legal rights and responsibilities. This is not correct. Whilst in other jurisdictions there are often differences in legal responsibilities associated with civil partnership, this is not the case in Jersey. In the event that civil partnerships are introduced for all couples, it will be essential to support people to understand the associated legal rights and responsibilities.

5. Age of Marriage

Background

The United Nation's Committee on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) states that that UK and Crown Dependencies – which includes Jersey – should raise the minimum age of marriage to 18 years.

Response to consultation

The public were asked if they agreed that the law should be amended to raise the minimum age of marriage to 18.

77% of respondents agreed; 13% disagreed; 10% said they did not know or had no preference and 5 did not answer the question.

It is clear from the consultation responses that the majority of respondents were strongly in favour of raising the age of marriage in line with the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC):

“Most importantly, this is a question of Jersey being seen to do the right thing internationally, to give its support to the UN Convention of the Rights of the Child in the UN's efforts to stop forced marriages of young girls, in particular, across the globe.”

“Jersey should be compliant with the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child.”

Some respondents thought that raising the age of marriage to 18 did not go far enough:

“I actually feel it should be 21.”

“It should be even higher than 18. Too many people get married without the experience of life to fully understand what they are agreeing to.”

“18 is much better than 16, but is it old enough? A 16 year old is a child who is going through the disruptive mental & physical transformations of the teenage years. They can change their minds so quickly as they are still maturing, trying to find their way. How could they possibly, responsibly make what is supposed to be a lifelong decision?”

Those opposed to raising the age of marriage queried the disconnect between the age of marriage and age of sexual consent:

“Raising the minimum marriage age to 18 only makes sense if it is accompanied by a corresponding raise in the age of consent. If a 16- or 17-year-old is considered too young to marry, they must also be considered too young for sex, which is laughable. Sex comes with consequences, and allowing a couple to have sex without the option to marry (first or subsequently) seems to make no sense, especially for those who wish to wait until they are married.”

“Age of marriage is inextricably linked to age of consent. To raise the marriage age without raising the age of consent you will create the situation where someone cannot be considered mature enough to enter into a committed relationship but can have two children and be pregnant with a third by the time they are.”

6. Other areas of consideration

The public were also asked if there were any other areas of reform that the government should be considering.

The issues raised by respondents can be categorised into the following common themes:

- better access to, and availability, of support and guidance services pre and post-divorce
- concerns about the fees charged by lawyers, and the overall cost of the divorce process
- requirement to make provision for pension sharing arrangements in Jersey
- a requirement to address matters related to a wife's dependent domicile
- whether or not occupancy orders are required and in what circumstances they would be utilised.

These themes will be further considered in partnership with key stakeholders as part of the policy and legislation development process.

7. Next Steps

Work will now commence on the development of amended legislation for consideration by the States Assembly. The legislation development process includes:

- Confirmation of a policy position in consultation with key stakeholders where necessary/required
- Development of Law Drafting instructions
- Law Drafting
- Consultation on draft legislation
- Amendments made to draft legislation where required
- Lodge draft legislation for debate by the States Assembly

Consultation

Divorce reform, future of civil partnerships, age of marriage

SUMMARY

1. The Minister for Home Affairs wishes to seek Islanders views on three issues - divorce reform, the future of civil partnerships and age of marriage.
 - a. Divorce reform: In September 2015, the States Assembly agreed in principle that new divorce legislation should be introduced and that consideration should be given to:
 - removing the three year bar on divorce - at the moment you have to be married for three years before filing for divorce
 - moving to 'no fault divorce' – allowing a person to file for divorce without having to claim that their spouse was a fault
 - introducing joint filing for divorce
 - removing the ability to contest a divorce
 - b. Future of civil partnerships: In June 2018, the UK Supreme Court ruled that it is discriminatory to only allow same-sex couples to enter into a civil partnership. Jersey needs to consider whether to amend its law to:
 - extend civil partnerships to opposite sex couples, in addition to same sex couples, or
 - close civil partnerships to new couples, but retain existing civil partnerships.
 - c. Age of marriage: The United Nations Committee on the Convention of the Rights of the Child has recommended that Jersey no longer allows 16 and 17 years olds to get married. Consideration needs to be given as to whether the minimum age of marriage should be raised to 18 years.

SECTION 1: DIVORCE REFORM

Overview

6. Divorce⁶ is a fact of life^{7,8} Regardless of how much people, and society as a whole, invest in marriage it is the case that relationships breakdown. When they do it is usually an extremely stressful and traumatic process.
7. From a policy perspective, it is not in anyone's interest to force people to stay in unhappy relationships or to make the process of divorce difficult. Nor is it in anyone's interest to undermine marriage by making it too easy to walk away. The law, whilst never undermining the stability of marriage, should work to minimise unnecessary conflict when a marriage has irretrievably broken down. Such conflict only serves to further damage the couple and any children they may have.
8. Proposed changes to Jersey's existing divorce law could include:
 - moving to 'no fault' divorce – allowing a person to file for divorce without having to claim that their spouse was at fault
 - allowing couples to jointly file for divorce where both believe their marriage has irretrievably broken down – removing the need for one to instigate proceedings against the other
 - removing the requirement for couples who have filed for divorce, but are not yet divorced, to live separately. Allowing them to continue to live together can potentially help facilitate reconciliation
 - removing the ability of one spouse to contest the other spouse's application for divorce
 - removing the three year bar on divorce - at the moment you have to be married for three years before filing for divorce
9. None of the proposed changes are intended to make divorce 'easy' – the focus is on diffusing potential conflict, building in time for reflection and trying to support divorcing couples to maintain a reasonable relationship with each other.

⁶ Throughout this consultation document the terms divorce has been used. This is intended to include dissolution of a civil partnership but the term divorce is used for ease of reading.

⁸ Civil partnerships were introduced in Jersey in 2012. 15 couples entered a civil partnership in Jersey in 2017. There have been no dissolutions of civil partnerships over that period.

Note: Public attitudes toward divorce

In January 2018 a small scale digital survey was undertaken to kick-start the process of understanding more about public attitudes towards our divorce law.

972 people participated in that survey which found that:

66% of survey respondents agreed that Jersey should introduce no-fault divorce.

69% of survey respondents did not know that there was a 3 year bar to applying to get divorced

60% of survey respondents said they believed the 3 year bar should be lifted

Grounds for divorce

10. Currently when a person files for divorce in Jersey they must cite the grounds for that divorce (i.e. state the reason why they want to get divorced). Grounds for divorce in Jersey are based on a period of separation (i.e. the spouses do not live together) or on 'fault' (i.e. one spouse declares the other spouse to be fault)

11. There are two periods of separation in relation to divorce⁹:

- c. the spouses have lived apart continuously for at least 1 year if both spouses agree to get a divorce, or
- d. the spouses have lived apart continuously for at least 2 years if only one spouse want to divorce.

Both must be continuous periods. This means that if the couple spend a single night together, the clock needs to start again. This does not support couples to see if they can reconcile their differences. Indeed the requirement for a continuous period of separation actually deters attempts at reconciliation.

There are five grounds for fault:

- a. adultery^{10, 11}: a spouse has committed adultery and the other finds it intolerable to live with them
- b. desertion: a spouse has deserted the other for two years or more
- c. unreasonable behaviour: a spouse has behaved in such a way that it is unreasonable to expect the other to live with them (for example: violence or abuse, drunkenness or drug-taking, refusing to financially contribute)

⁹ These periods of separation are lower than England & Wales which currently stand at 2 years and 5 years.

¹⁰ Adultery is defined as an act between a man and a woman. It cannot be cited if a spouse has an affair with someone of the same-sex (i.e. a man who is married to a woman cannot cite adultery if his wife has an affair with another woman, only if she has an affair with another man)

¹¹ Adultery is also defined as as a penetrative act. It does not include other sexual acts.

- d. mental disorder: a spouse has a mental disorder for which they have been continually receiving care or treatment for at least five years
 - e. imprisonment: a spouse has been sentenced to life imprisonment or for not less than 15 years
12. Jersey is one of only a relative few jurisdictions¹² that has fault-based divorce, as opposed to no-fault divorce or broader based grounds such as irretrievable breakdown.
 13. Fault-based divorce can be a major contributor to conflict, as one partner is required to state that the other is at fault. In truth, however, it cannot be known if the “innocent party” substantially or wholly contributed to the marriage breakdown. They are merely the person who filed for divorce and cited the fault. Where fault is cited, the other partner rarely defends themselves even if the accusations are unfair. It is expensive to do so (i.e. legal fees) and there are no associated financial benefits. Contrary to common beliefs, the Courts do not award the ‘innocent’ party a greater proportion of assets.
 14. Given that fault-based divorce provides no financial benefit and can be grossly unfair, it is reasonable to question if it should be retained. Fault-based divorce does nothing to support forgiveness or cordial relations – which are critical if divorcing couples are to successfully co-parent in future.
 15. Consideration is being given to removing the current grounds for divorce, both in relation to period of separation and fault based grounds.

Divorce process and timeframe

16. Currently in Jersey, one spouse must petition for divorce, must cite the grounds for divorce and give evidence of those grounds. This builds conflict into the process from the outset.
17. In addition to removing the current grounds for divorce, consideration is also being given to the introduction of a new divorce process and timeframe. That process would mirror the existing two stage process whereby the Courts issue a decree nisi and then a decree absolute, except that:
 - the couple can jointly or either one of the spouses can individually give notice to the court of their intention to divorce,
 - in giving notice to the court, they would state that their marriage had broken down irretrievably, thus removing the need to cite fault.
18. The Court, as per the current process, would issue a decree nisi and then, after a minimum period of time could issue a decree absolute. The decree absolute will formally bring the marriage to an end.
19. The minimum timeframe between decree nisi and decree absolute is currently six weeks. Consideration is being given to extending this minimum period to six months. The purpose of the extended minimum timeframe would provide the couple a more appropriate timeframe in which to consider if divorce is the correct pathway for them and, if so, to allow them sufficient time to agree practical arrangements concerning the changes to family life, housing, financial issues etc.

20. Furthermore, where a spouse/s have filed for divorce, it is proposed that there be no requirement for them to live separately. Allowing the couple to continue to live together can potentially help them to consider reconciliation and can help them avoid financial hardship whilst practical matters are resolved.

Note: Quick Divorce

Our existing law facilitates the quick divorce. Providing a couple have been married for at least three years, and that the grounds for divorce relate to fault, it can take as little as nine weeks to move from filing for divorce to being divorced. A period which allows no time for reflection.

Contested divorce

21. Consideration will also be given to amending the law to do away with contested divorce. Whilst contested divorce is currently permitted in Jersey law, it is largely a thing of the past - there have been none in the Island for approximately 20 years.
22. Contesting a divorce is expensive. It rarely results in the Courts refusing to issue a decree absolute and, if fault based divorce is to be abolished, contested divorce becomes virtually obsolete as a spouse will not need to defend themselves from unfair accusations of fault.
23. Furthermore, it is regrettably the case that a marriage has come to an end when one spouse believes or wants it to be so. This would also include in cases of domestic abuse where it is theoretically possible for a perpetrator to mis-use the legal process by contesting a divorce, or cross-petitioning with allegations about the petitioner's conduct, in order to continue their controlling and coercive behaviour.

Three year bar

24. In Jersey couples must be married for a least three years before they can file for divorce. It is currently only one year in England & Wales, and there is no time limit in Scotland or in Guernsey. This can be three very long and unhappy years for people, who may well be living separate lives, but who are stuck in relationships that have irrevocably broken down¹³.
25. It has previously been argued that the three year bar is a safeguard against irresponsible or hasty marriages but there is no evidence to support this. 69% of respondents to the 2018 digital survey did not know that the three year bar existed – it cannot be a deterrent if people do not know about it. And, even if a person embarking on an irresponsible marriage did know about it, there is nothing to suggest it would act as a deterrent.

¹³ Note: A divorce can be granted in less than three years if there is exceptional hardship or depravity, but this does not include all forms of abuse or adultery.

26. The three year bar does not support marriage; it only acts to punish people whose relationship has broken down. Consideration is being given to removing the three year bar.

Minimising conflict/ mediation services

27. It is important to minimise conflict in divorce not just because of the effect it has on couples but also on their children. There is a body of research evidence which clearly shows that conflict between parents has a detrimental effect on children's outcomes, increasing the risk of anxiety, depression, aggression and anti-social behaviour¹⁴. It is therefore essential that we look to reduce harm.
28. P.77, as adopted by the States Assembly September 2015, proposed that consideration should be given to making it a legal requirement to access and use mediation services¹⁵ subject to appropriate safeguards and human rights considerations.
29. Further to consultation with key stakeholders, this proposal is no longer being progressed; concerns were raised about the associated safeguards and about the effectiveness of what could be perceived as 'forced' or non-consensual mediation.
30. Whilst compulsory mediation is not being progressed, the proposed law changes focus on reconciliation (supporting and encouraging couples to consider whether they should stay together) and on amicable resolution (supporting couples to overcome unnecessary conflict). This will include, as set out above;
- reducing conflict by moving to a system of joint filing and no fault divorce
 - supporting reconciliation by doing nothing that hinders couples who decide to try and reconcile their differences, for example introducing an extended minimum timeframe between decree nisi and decree absolute and allowing spouses to continue to live together during that period
31. Furthermore, the government will review what steps it should take to help support access to high quality reconciliation and mediation services. This will include reviewing existing government support provided to these services and ensuring better access to guidance on associated matters such as parenting plans, legal principles relating to children and finances etc. (See Addendum 1 to consultation report which provides further background information on collective resolution pathways)

Note: Divorce in England and Wales

¹⁴ See Equal Marriage Report (R 170/2014)

¹⁵ The mediation process brings spouses together in order to try and jointly find a solution, as opposed to each person engaging their own separate lawyer who will only represent the interests of that person, or having to resort to the Courts.

The Ministry of Justice for England and Wales published a consultation on the 15th September setting out its divorce reform proposals, many of which are reflected in Jersey's consultation.

SECTION 2: CIVIL PARTNERSHIPS

Overview

32. Same-sex marriage became legal in Jersey on 1 July 2018. This means that both opposite-sex and same-sex couples can get married. This is not the case for civil partnerships, which are only available to same-sex couples.
33. In July 2018 the UK Supreme Court ruled that it is discriminatory to only allow same-sex couples to enter into a civil partnership. Jersey should therefore amend its law. The overriding question is:
- should civil partnerships be retained and extended to opposite-sex couples? (Option 1). Or,
 - should Jersey stop new civil partnerships now that same-sex marriage has been introduced? (Option 2).
34. The purpose of this section of the consultation is to explore those two options. What is not being considered is:
- abolishing all existing civil partnerships - this would be harmful to couples in existing civil partnerships as these couples would be required to convert their civil partnership to marriage and some jurisdictions, most notably France, do not recognise converted civil partnerships as legal marriages
 - extending civil partnerships to siblings or family members – this is often cited as a way for family members to better manage matters relating to inheritance.

Background

Civil partnerships in Jersey

35. Civil partnerships were introduced in Jersey in 2012. The aim was to provide same-sex couples the same rights and responsibilities that opposite-sex couples could acquire through marriage, at a point in time when same-sex marriage was not considered a viable option.
36. In August 2014, the Chief Minister's Department undertook an *Equal Marriage*¹⁶ consultation. Whilst the consultation primarily focused on the proposed introduction of same-sex marriage, it also asked Islanders whether they thought that civil partnerships should be available to opposite-sex couples.
37. 72% of the people who responded to that particular question agreed that civil partnerships should be available to opposite-sex couples. However, it was very clear from reading the associated comments that their primary concern was a perceived need to provide legal rights for 'common-law' couples, as opposed to supporting the extension of civil partnerships.

38. Other respondents expressed concern that extending civil partnerships would simply create a "2nd tier" of marriage, which was not materially differently and therefore viewed as unnecessary (or, in some cases, as a direct threat to the institution of marriage).
39. The 2014 consultation was limited, however, so in 2015, when the States Assembly debated marriage reform, it was accepted that the civil partnership law should remain unaltered until either more was understood about the uptake of civil partnerships post the introduction of same-sex marriage, or there was a related court ruling, which has now happened.

Difference between civil partnerships and marriage

40. There is no difference between civil partnership and marriage, except what they are called and people's perceptions of potential differences.
41. The rights provided to couples in a civil partnership are the same as those provided to married spouses, except in relation to a few matters. These matters arise as result of historic differences in the ways in which males and females were treated in law (such as differences in pension ages), or sex based definitions (such as the legal definition of adultery which, is only applicable to male/female sexual relations). These differences apply to marriage between same-sex couples, not just civil partnerships.
42. It is argued that civil partnerships should be made available to all couples because:
 - it is discriminatory to only allow same-sex couples to enter into a civil partnership. This is true, but equality can be achieved either by extending civil partnership or stopping new civil partnerships;
 - marriage is perceived by some as being an old fashioned and patriarchal institution. It is also argued that people who have previously been married may not, wish to marry again but would like to enter into a civil partnership because they may perceive it as being different to marriage.

Other Jurisdictions

43. England and Wales: Theresa May recently announced that "the Government will change the law to allow opposite-sex couples in England and Wales to enter into a civil partnership" this is a commitment to extend civil partnerships without consultation.
45. Scotland: The Scottish Government published a consultation on the future of civil partnerships on the 28 September. Like Jersey, they are considering whether to stop new civil partnerships or extend to opposite-sex couples. <https://beta.gov.scot/publications/future-civil-partnership-scotland/>
46. Sweden and a number of other Nordic countries have closed civil partnerships to new couples since the introduction of same-sex marriage. They have adopted this approach because they do not recognise the need for an alternative legal framework of rights and responsibilities now that all couples can marry.

47. There are jurisdictions, for example the Netherlands, New Zealand and France that have both marriage for all couples and civil partnership for all couples. In those jurisdictions, however, there is often quite substantial legal differences between marriage and civil partnerships unlike in Jersey. For example, the French equivalent to a civil partnership (known as a civil solidarity pact – PAC) was introduced with the express intent of bringing in rights and responsibilities, which were less than marriage.

Option 1: Extending to opposite-sex couples

48. 72% of respondents to the 2014 Equal Marriage consultation stated that civil partnerships should be made available to opposite-sex couples. The most commonly cited reasons relate to:

- concerns about a lack of legal rights for cohabiting couples
- the need to introduce opposite-sex civil partnerships on the basis of equality.

Rights of co-habiting couples

Civil partnerships were not intended to provide rights for co-habiting couples. They were intended to provide rights equivalent to marriage for same-sex couples who could not marry. It is an important distinction.

Some jurisdictions do provide a framework of rights for cohabiting couples and, in some cases these legal frameworks can be misunderstood as being akin to a civil partnership, but the rights provided are not as extensive as those provided to married couples. The issue of whether or not to extend civil partnerships to all couples sometimes becomes entangled with the issue of whether or not to introduce rights for co-habiting couples.

This consultation report is accompanied by a separate Addendum which provides some background information about rights for cohabiting couples and living together agreements.

49. Reasons for extending civil partnerships to opposite-sex couples include:

- Civil partnerships provide a legal framework of rights and responsibilities for opposite-sex couples who do not want to get married. Both same-sex and opposite-sex couples will be able to choose the form of legal relationship which is most relevant to them.
- This would enable couples already in a civil partnership to remain in a civil partnership if one partner changed their legal sex. These couples could, however, convert their civil partnership to a marriage.

50. Reasons for not extending civil partnerships (i.e. closing to new couples) include:

- Civil partnerships were introduced at a time when same sex marriage was not seen as realistic. There is no longer a need for civil partnerships.
- Civil partnerships for all are perceived by some as having the potential to diminish the institution of marriage.
- There is a misconception that the existence of both marriage and civil partnership would provide a choice for couples, whereas in fact the difference lies only in the name: the rights provided by both are virtually the same as the legal and financial responsibilities provided by civil partnerships are equivalent to marriage

- The existence of two separate but almost identical legal relationships (i.e. marriage and civil partnerships) could be confusing to the public and will be more complex to administer.
- It is unclear as to whether or not people will want to enter into civil partnerships if they can marry, in which case it is a very significant change for very little benefit. A consultation undertaken in England & Wales in 2014¹⁷ found that 63% of unmarried heterosexual respondents said they would rather marry, compared to only 20% who would prefer to form a civil partnership. This consultation process will help us establish whether similar attitudes are held in Jersey. Although it should be noted that the Prime Minister has nevertheless still announced plans to introduce civil partnerships for all in England and Wales.
- There is, to date, no evidence of significant demand of opposite sex couples wishing to form a civil partnership. In jurisdictions where comparable opposite sex civil partnerships have been introduced, there is still a clear preference for marriage.
- On a practical level, if Jersey were to extend civil partnerships to opposite-sex couples, those couples would only be recognised as civil partners in other jurisdictions which have opposite-sex civil partnerships. The effect of the legislation could therefore be very limited.

Option 2: Stopping new civil partnerships but retain existing ones

Matters for consideration

51. Whilst it is not proposed that existing civil partnerships are abolished, the law could be amended to prevent people entering into new civil partnerships in Jersey. Doing so would go some way to removing a legal framework which is seen by some as a 2nd tier form of marriage.
52. There are however legitimate reasons for keeping civil partnerships, including:
 - civil partnerships provide a social and legal framework that is perceived by some to stop short of marriage, but which supports couples to articulate their commitment to each other
 - civil partnerships are seen by some as a viable alternative to marriage. Whilst civil marriage (i.e. marriage solemnised by the Superintendent Registrar or an independent marriage celebrant in Jersey) is free from religious elements it is still marriage and carries with it traditional associations that some are uncomfortable with
 - if civil partnerships are retained those same-sex couples who believe that marriage is a union between man and a woman, and therefore do not want to get married, can still access a social and legal framework that recognises their relationship

Costs associated with change

¹⁷ <https://www.gov.uk/government/consultations/consultation-on-the-future-of-civil-partnership-in-england-and-wales>

53. Regardless of the changes made, there would be a one-off cost to the public sector to make the necessary legal, IT and administrative changes. In addition,
- if new civil partnership are stopped, the public sector would incur ongoing costs in relation to administration of civil partnership as well was marriages until no civil partnerships remained in existence (for example, in relation to court procedures etc)
 - if civil partnerships are extended to opposite couples, there would be ongoing costs associated with the administration of two different forms of legal relationship. Furthermore, there would be costs associated with giving consideration to, and facilitating married couples to convert their marriage to a civil partnership.

Questions

Stopping new civil partnerships but retaining existing ones would also mean that couples who do not want to get married would lack legal structure for recognition of their relationship.

However, extending civil partnerships to opposite-sex couples potentially creates a form of 2nd tier marriage and increase cost to the public purse over a longer time period. The central dilemma is whether civil partnerships are needed now that any couple can get married?

SECTION 3: AGE OF MARRIAGE

Overview

54. A 16 year old or 17 year old can currently get married in Jersey if their parent/s consent to that marriage¹⁸.
55. Allowing a 16 or 17 year old to get married is, however, clearly at odds with the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) which states that a child is a child until they reach the age of 18.
56. Jersey is party to that Convention.
57. It is the view of the UN Committee that oversees compliance with the UNCRC that jurisdictions which permit 16 and 17 years olds to marry are permitting child marriage. In 2016, that Committee recommended that UK and all devolved administrations, and Crown Dependencies – which includes Jersey - raise the minimum age of marriage to 18 years.
58. This position is echoed by UNICEF which calls on all governments, not just those in the developing world, to outlaw child marriages. It is argued that developed nations have a special obligation to set standards and outlaw marriage below 18 years of age in order to help protect children, usually young girls, who in some nations are married off at 12 or 13 years of age.

Background

Current position in Jersey

59. 16 and 17 year olds can currently get married in Jersey because the Marriage and Civil Status (Jersey) Law 2001 (the “2001 Law”) permits them to do so. The 2001 Law was based on the preceding Loi (1842) sur l’Etat Civil, which reflected the social norms at that time it was drafted. In Loi (1842) sur l’Etat Civil prevailing attitudes required the legal minimum age of marriage to mirror the age of sexual consent (i.e., 16 years old) so that teenagers who wanted to have sex could get married first.
60. In Loi (1842) sur l’Etat Civil it was seen as particularly important that a 16 or 17 year old girl, who was pregnant, should be able to marry to ensure that the child was not born out of wedlock. Whilst some people still believe it is important for children to be born to married parents, there has been a significant shift in social norms. It is now estimated that approximately 40% of children born in Jersey have unmarried parents¹⁹, indicating that marriage is no longer seen as prerequisite for having children.
61. Changing attitudes to legitimacy are already reflected in Jersey Law. Since 2011 the Wills and Successions (Jersey) Law 1993 has provided that illegitimate and legitimate children have equal rights of succession.

¹⁸ Guardians may also consent

¹⁹ Based on analysis of the register of births.

62. Whilst 16 or 17 years old children can marry in Jersey, only an extremely small number do²⁰. Young people are making different choices, including
- staying in education - currently 68.4% of Jersey's young people continue in education beyond the age of 18²¹
 - cohabitating prior to marriage – figures from the Office of National Statistics (ONS) show that in 2011 84 percent of couples who entered into their first marriage cohabitated prior to it²²
 - marrying later - ONS figures show for marriages of opposite-sex couples, the average age for men marrying in 2015 was 37.5 years, while for women it was 35.1 years. This represents an increase compared with 2014 (37.0 years for men and 34.6 years for women) and continues the overall rise recorded since the 1970s. The average age at marriage for same-sex couples in 2015 was slightly higher at 40.6 years for men and 37.0 years for women.
63. In the UK just 2% of marriages that took place in 2013 were between people who were under the age of 20
64. Whilst Jersey data is not directly comparable it can probably be assumed that it will broadly replicate UK trends.

Other jurisdictions

65. Numerous other jurisdictions have, historically, taken the same approach as Jersey, with a minimum age of marriage which mirrors the age of sexual consent, but not all. Countries such as Germany, Luxembourg and Portugal already have different ages and others, such as France are in the process of changing to law to make 18 the minimum age of marriage for all.

Jurisdiction	Minimum age of Marriage	Minimum age of sexual consent
Jersey, England & Wales	18 (16 with parental consent)	16
Australia	18 (16 with permission from parents and the court only granted in exceptional circumstances)	16
Canada	18 (16 parental consent)	16
Finland	18 (under 18 with judicial consent in extraordinary circumstances)	16
Netherlands	18 (16 with consent from the Minister of Justice or parental consent in case of pregnancy)	16

²⁰ Since 2007 there have only been four applications for marriage relating to a 16 or 17 year old. In all causes, it is the bride who has been 16 or 17 years old.

Portugal	18 (17 with parental consent)	14

Law in Jersey

66. There are two laws which provide for people to get married in Jersey;
- a. the Marriage and Civil Status (Jersey) Law 2001 (the “2001 Law”) which deals with civil and non-Anglican religious wedding, and
 - b. the Canons of the Church of England in Jersey (Canon Law) which deals with marriage in accordance with the rites of the Church of England (Anglican marriage)
67. Both allow for a child aged 16 or 17 years old to get married providing that they have the consent of their parent(s) or their guardian(s)²³.
68. The 2001 Law allows the States Assembly to increase that the age of marriage by regulation²⁴ if it is minded to do so, but the Assembly does not have the powers to change Canon Law. That will be a decision of the Church of England.
69. If the States Assembly increased the minimum age of marriage to 18, this would mean that Jersey would end up with two laws each with a different minimum age of marriage. Whilst this may appear to be slightly strange, it is not problematic. The Dean of Jersey, who issues licenses to marry under Canon Law would choose not to issue licences to 16

²³ Article 4 of the 2001 Law sets out that a child aged 16 or 17 years old may get married with the consent of their parent/s or guardian/s. The law also provides for consent to be given in relation to children who are in care.

²⁴ The power to increase the age of marriage by regulation is set out in Article 82 (1) of the 2001 Law. This power was introduced in July 2018 when the 2001 Law was subject to major amendment to allow for same-sex marriage and open-air marriage, but the age of marriage was not increased at that point because the public had not been consulted about the matter.

ADDENDUM 1

COLLABORATIVE RESOLUTION TOOLBOX

In Jersey a number of pathways are available for couples who want to work collaboratively to find a solution to end their marriage. There is no statutory basis for mediation, collaborative law or arbitration, but equally there is nothing to prevent agreement being reached in any way in which the parties agree to work. Any agreement reached as a result of mediation, collaborative law or arbitration is usually converted into a draft consent order, which once ordered by the court is enforceable as any other order.

Mediation

Consideration needs to be given to the following:

- appropriate safeguards and exemptions: for example in the event of domestic violence, or where divorce is urgently sought because one of the spouses has participated in serious criminal activity
- human rights considerations: Under the European Convention for Human Rights (ECHR) consideration must be given to ensuring that there are no disproportionate restrictions in relation to people's ability to access the Courts or get divorced.

In England and Wales, couples are therefore only required to attend a mediation information and assessment meeting, they are not actually required to participate in mediation. Other European countries employ a variety of different incentives and sanctions and in some, mediation is mandatory under prescribed circumstances (for example, in many Nordic countries and in certain areas of Spain). What is critically important is that where mediation is mandatory, it does not impede access to the judicial system.

In America, where the ECHR does not apply, participation in mediation is a legal requirement in 13 States and judges are provided discretion to order couples to enter mediation in 22 States.

In Sweden, mediation is called 'cooperation talks'. These are defined as talks where the parents under expert guidance try to arrive at a common point of view on the questions of custody and access. The goal of the talks is to make the parents reach an agreement, but even if no agreement is reached, through these talks parents may learn how to understand each other's opinions better and how to manage their conflicts in a way that negatively affects the children as little as possible. The goal is partly for them to agree on questions involving their children and partly to improve their ability to cooperate as parents.

Ninety per cent of the parents who separate in Sweden solve the questions regarding custody, residency and access either entirely on their own or with assistance through cooperation talks or family counselling. Ten per cent of the parents receive help from the court to solve the questions mentioned.

In Norway, according to the Marriage Act 1991, which came into force on 1 January 1993, mediation is compulsory for spouses who have children from their marriage who are under 16 years of age (Section 26 Marriage Act), except in specific cases, such as in cases of domestic violence (Section 23 Marriage Act). This does not mean that they are compelled to reach an agreement, but that they must initiate mediation before the case is brought before the County Governor or a court (Section 26 Marriage Act).

Arbitration

Similar to mediation consideration needs to be given to the following:

- appropriate safeguards: for example in the event of domestic violence, or where divorce is urgently sought because one of the spouses has participated in serious criminal activity
- human rights considerations: Under the European Convention for Human Rights (ECHR) consideration must be given to ensuring that there are no disproportionate restrictions in relation to people's ability to access the Courts or get divorced.

Arbitration proceedings are not overseen by a judge, instead they are conducted by a trained arbitrator who acts in a similar non-court based capacity to a judge. They will decide what decisions need to be made and those decisions will be binding for both parties. However the arbitrator, unlike a judge, can have a greater degree of leniency because all parties can have their say in the landscape of the ruling. This does require a greater amount of trust by both parties as the decision is final and agreements are signed to this end, as such the training criteria and level of expertise required to become an arbitrator is strictly controlled.

Arbitration is currently used in England and Wales however not usually for matters relating to family law, it allows parties to choose a decision maker whilst keeping the entire matter confidential. It also provides a determination that both parties agree to honour when entering into the process and for this reason can be quicker and more cost effective to the parties involved. The awards that arise from a determination can be converted into consent orders in a similar way to a mediated settlement. If we are including facilities within divorce law for mediation then it would be relatively straight forward to incorporate arbitration settlements also. However arbitration does not contain facilities for appeals this is because with both parties agreeing on the appointment of the decision maker it is deemed that appeals would undermine this appointment process. Arbitration also requires full participation from and the trust of both parties and as such will not be suitable for everyone, it is also not bound by divorce laws and as such operates on a parallel plane. A suitable interface with the divorce process would need to be mapped and defined.

Collaborative Law

Similar to mediation and arbitration consideration needs to be given to the following:

- appropriate safeguards: for example in the event of domestic violence, or where divorce is urgently sought because one of the spouses has participated in serious criminal activity
- human rights considerations: Under the European Convention for Human Rights (ECHR) consideration must be given to ensuring that there are no disproportionate restrictions in relation to people's ability to access the Courts.

The underpinning element of collaborative law is both parties working together to agree a solution. Both parties will choose and appoint their own collaboratively trained lawyer. The parties will then come together for a series of face to face meetings to conduct negotiations.

Each party have legal advisers present throughout the process to provide support and advice.

All four parties, the couple and their respective lawyers all sign a participation agreement prior to commencing the process. This states that no party will issue proceedings and it also prohibits either lawyer from representing their party in court if the collaborate process breaks down this provides a real incentive for all parties to be absolutely committed to finding the best solution by agreement rather than through court proceedings.

Both parties have the opportunity to consult with an independent financial advisor, a family consultant, a child specialist or an accountant, who will provide specialist guidance regarding financial matters and those concerning children, parenting, communication and emotional support if and when required

PROTECTION FOR COHABITATING COUPLES & LIVING TOGETHER AGREEMENTS

The purpose of this Addendum to the, Divorce reform, future of civil partnerships & age of marriage consultation document is to provide some background information about protection for cohabiting couples and living together agreements

Background: Cohabiting couples

In Jersey a significant number of adults live together without being married and a significant number of children are born to unmarried parents and/or live with unmarried adults (this includes children living with one parent and that parent's partner, or both their unmarried parents):

- approximately 40% of children born in Jersey have unmarried parents²⁵
- approximately 22% of all couples who live together are not married²⁶
- of all households that include a couple and children, 15% of those couples are not married

Cohabitation is more prevalent than marriage amongst younger age groups. Around half of people aged 16 to 34 who live together, are cohabiting as opposed to being married.

The death of one of the partners, or the breakdown of the relationship, is as traumatic for cohabiting partners as it is for those who are married or in a civil partnership. It can also bring added challenges when people realise that, despite having lived together for years and even having children together, their "common-law" relationship has no legal status and that rights of spouses or civil partners do not apply to them. This includes in relation to:

- a. Property ownership: the Court has no power to override the strict legal ownership of the property and cannot divide it as they may do on divorce or dissolution. It may, in some very limited circumstances, be possible to demonstrate beneficial ownership but this is neither a simple nor cheap process in terms of legal fees.
- b. Inheritance: if one of the partners dies without having made a will, the other partner does not have an automatic right to inheritance regardless of how long they have lived together or even if they have children together. This can be contested in Court, but there are obvious emotional and financial implications.
- c. Exemption to testify: spouses and civil partners are exempt from testifying against each other in Court. This does not apply to cohabiting partners.

²⁵ Based on analysis of the register of births.

²⁶ The Jersey figures have been calculated using 2011 Census data, and are based on the more common household types such as adult couples with or without children. The Jersey figures exclude couples from 'other' household types (for example three generation households, house-sharing or households with a live in au-pair) as the relevant inter-relationship information is not available.

Because cohabiting couples lack status in law, at the point of break-up, there is no strict recognition of the financial contribution that either partner may have made (for example: paying toward the mortgage even though the family home was owned by the other partner) or of the economic sacrifices that either partners may have made (for example; not working in order to bring up children). This can result in one of the partners, and potentially their children, suffering serious economic disadvantage.

Background: Living together agreements

Any cohabiting couple in Jersey can set up a living together agreement (also known as a cohabitation agreement) setting out what will happen if the relationship breaks down, particularly in relation to the sharing of property. These agreements do not extend to matters such as pensions and benefits however, as these are a matter for law, nor to matters of inheritance which are governed by the terms of a validly executed will or, in the absence of a will, by the law of succession.

Living together agreements, if they are fair and reasonable, and have been entered into willingly by both partners, can be extremely beneficial in helping to minimise conflict at the point of break-up, particularly where a home, or an asset, needs to be secured or shared for the wellbeing of any children.

Living together agreements can currently be set up as a form of legal deed and, where they are, there is a presumption in law that they stand subject to the discretion of the Court and appropriate safeguards which may, for example, include:

- neither partner was coerced or put undue pressure to sign the agreement
- the agreement was signed at least twelve weeks before the relationship broke down (or potentially a longer period of time)
- both partners received independent legal advice before signing
- both partners provided correct information
- enforcing the agreement would not create financial hardship for their children.
