Your comments

This is quite unbelievable, not least in the timing of the application to coincide with the Christmas holiday when the planning offices were presumably shut and people were unable to submit an objection. Aside from that all the old objections must still surely stand? The worst aspect would be the impact on that peaceful area of headland of the cars which will inevitably go with that number of houses particularly in view of the size of some of them A 5-bedroomed house is by definition intended for 6 people, all of whom may own a car. There is therefore the potential for 135 cars plus visitors' vehicles. This smacks of pure greed by an already very wealthy individual who seems to have no regard for the natural beauty of this island. There are so many houses being built already and so many existing houses on the market with no prospective purchasers that it would be madness to add to this problem. I hope that the Environment Minister does what is right for the island and orders a public enquiry as previously intended, and does not bow down to the underhanded method this developer has used to flout the application process.
